Randomized controlled studies investigating the efficacy of epidural analgesia in postoperative pain relief are lacking. We compared the intensity of postoperative pain, consumption of rescue analgesia, and side-effects in 15 patients undergoing transurethral resection of the prostate (TURP) using conventional general anesthesia (GA) and 17 patients with intravenous anesthesia (IVA) after TURP in an observational study. Patients received either a continuous epidural analgesia (CEA) or IVA for intraoperative and postoperative analgesia. Pain levels were assessed by visual analog scale (VAS) both at rest and during activity, at rest on postoperative day (POD) 0, 1, and 3. Consumption of analgesics (PO) was recorded until day 3 postoperatively, and side-effects were registered. Compared to IVA, CEA was associated with less intense postoperative pain scores at rest (VAS 0: IVA, 6.6 +/- 0.9; CEA, 0.8 +/- 0.3; P 3: IVA, 52%; CEA, 14%; P the mass of the system.
