1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a display system and an information processor.

2. Description of the Related Art An information processor has a display section capable of displaying multiple pieces of information. An information processor is known which selectively displays information in the multiple pieces of information displayed by the display section. The information processor displays two pieces of information by simultaneously and repeatedly displaying the two pieces of information displayed on the display screen in the multiple pieces of information. For example, Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 2010-30544 discloses a technique for displaying multiple pieces of information on the display section of the information processor by repetitively displaying the multiple pieces of information on the display section while displaying, at the same time, a plurality of items of information that make up the multiple pieces of information. In the information processor of the related art, the multiple pieces of information cannot be simultaneously displayed on the display section. It is possible to use the display section for display and the information processor has only limited display capability, resulting in a limitation on the usability of the information processor. PCR-based DNA genotyping for molecular epidemiological study of sheep scrapie in southeast Spain. With the aim of studying the molecular epidemiology of scrapie in sheep in southeast Spain, a series of 148 sheep that had been slaughtered between 1998 and 2003 for agricultural and/or public consumption was examined. Sporadically infected flocks were detected in more than half of the locations, and in the majority of infected flocks the presence of a defined strain of scrapie was confirmed by the deposition of PrP(Sc) in histopathology. Six of the 14 flocks with PrP(Sc) confirmed by histopathology were positive for the C/O polymorphism at codon 154 of the prion protein gene. The Patch. N.a.â€¢.Intravenous infusion therapy, commonly known as IV therapy or IV feeding, has been used for several decades for delivering nutrients and medicaments to patients. The administration of intravenous infusions typically involves administering a concentrated nutrient or medicament solution through a catheter that is implanted in the patient. In most cases, this is done by using an over-the-counter intravenous (IV) catheter that is attached to a bottle of nutrient solution or medication by way of a tubing set.

An access port attached to the tubing set is then connected to a catheter that is implanted in a suitable vein of the patient. In a recent article published on the BBC website, a military historian said that the biggest problem facing the military and the UK as a whole is lack of young adults in uniform. He said that the number of 18 to 24 year olds in the Army had dropped by about one quarter in the past ten years, and even the number of those aged between 25 and 29 who do volunteer to join the Army has dropped by nearly two thirds. The problem stems from the fact that a greater number of young adults are interested in a career in the financial sector, having become disillusioned with the prospect of joining the armed forces after high school and college, according to the military historian who has been commissioned to write a book about the state of the Army.
